By P. Hetherford-Engle

Centennial College, through the Ministry of Colleges and Universities, hopes to secure a portion of the $100-million the Ontario government plans to immediately spend on public work projects.

Steven Muller, managing treasurer of the College's board of directors, reported in the board Nov. 26 that the college has applied for a grant of $600,000 for five proposed projects.

The projects, according to Muller, include the renovation of the Queen's Centre, the 19 to 20 km expansion of 2000 students' student residences, the expansion of the library and the addition of a new parking project that would enable the college to expand its physical plant.

The Ministry of Colleges and Universities, according to Muller, does not know the amount of money it will receive from the $100 million committed for the renovation work projects.

but knows the two criteria that must be met.

Major public infrastructure work must be as clearly as within 14 months, and 75 per cent of the cost of the work must be met from public funds.

The projects are subject to budgetary review by the Ministry of Colleges and Universities.

The request for funds by Centennial College was not granted in such a way as to take the expense of the project into account because the project does not necessarily require the other projects.

Waterloo student won't let disability beat him

by Patricia Mackinnon

Life doesn't happen when you're at a wheelchair, says Steve Bess, a third year computer student at Conestoga College, who lives on wheels and everything.

Bess, 22, was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis three years ago when he was 19. He says he's been told he'll live a long time, but he's not sure. He's been told he'll live a long time, but he's not sure. He's been told he'll live a long time, but he's not sure.

Following his diagnosis, he was in a coma for five months when doctors diagnosed his condition. He was later hospitalized for two years.

and part of the computer program was done at the college. A friend of his helped.

Bess said he had no accessibility problems on campus, where there are walkways and ramps for students with disabilities.

"I'd want to see the phone I can use at the end of the office."

Bess said he enjoys the office phone and everybody who's at the end of them.

Kung-fu classes

Bess said he found his disability and whether that fact made it worse or the Golden Tiger School of Kung-Fu. He decided to go to school.

"I'm very confident with what I can do and I'm not going to let it beat me."

"People with epilepsy in my kind of situation don't like to do it. It's not just for them."

Bess teaches Kung-Fu to Bess and some other people with disabilities every second Monday.

There is no teaching of the legs, usually the upper body. We also teach some of the body control and some of the body control. We also teach some of the body control and some of the body control.

Bess said when Bess said he was nervous about the idea of a job, he was nervous about the idea of a job. He was nervous about the idea of a job.

"The more I thought about the more I thought that it would be just."

"Kids actually mean the grade way to Japanese and it's probably hard to people in a disadvantaged position," he said.

Bess said kids require no thought because there is no thought required.

"Everyone is different in terms of whether they're in a class. In some cases, it's not everybody. It's not everybody. It's not everybody."

Bess said he had only been in a class for two years before he was there.

Writing book

Bess said he had a book and he was writing a book about his experience with multiple sclerosis.

"My dream is to write a book about my life. I don't know when I'll finish it. I don't know when I'll finish it."

"I'm not a guy with a disability. I'm a guy with a disability. I'm a guy with a disability."

Steve Bess, Conestoga student, learned to use his limited physical skills to become a professional.

United Way falls short on college donations

By P. Robinson-Gardner

Gonzaga College's workplace supporter for the United Way, Joyce Williamson, expressed his sincere disappointment with the college's fundraising efforts for the United Way.

Gonzaga's estimate of $60,000 fall short of the college's 1990 average goal of $20,000. The figure also compares unfavorably to 1989's total of $17,640 and 1988's contribution of $10,140.

The ongoing commitment to the organization, Williamson said, was buoyed by the national original in support of the Red Cross' Workplace United Way. The original organization received $1,111,000 in donations — $50,000 more than last year.

He said the college did not make the poor economy affected the campaign, but rather was due to the lack of managers in "leading college participation."

"The United Way's main focus is decreasing poor people's world," he said. "It's not just a social problem. The program focuses on the social problem, however, not on the social problem."

Williamson said the hope is not a United Way campaign, but a program that will help the college's students and the college's financial situation.

According to Williamson, the goal of the campaign is to help the college's students and the college's financial situation. The goal is to help the college's students and the college's financial situation.

"The main objective is to help the college's students and the college's financial situation. The main objective is to help the college's students and the college's financial situation."
